'My daughter is big into Ed Sheeran,' says Kent & Curwen's creative director Daniel Kearns when we meet at the brand's townhouse on Savile Row, 'we have him on in the car every morning, which is quite horrific! Why are we discussing music? Because we're here to talk about the brand's collaboration with the Stone Roses for its SS19 collection, which is available for pre-order this month.

In case you're not familiar, Kent & Curwen is the classic English brand founded in 1926 by tlemaker Eric Kent and seamstress Dorothy Curwen to create regatta ties and sporting wear for the British upper classes. Acquired by the Fung family, one of Asia's richest dynasties, it was relaunched in 2016 and steered in a more contemporary direction with the appointment of Kearns - who's designed for everyone from McQueen to Vuitton - working in partnership with David Beckham.

Back to the Stone Roses though, who have provided four artworks from the cover of their self-titled first album, which have been printed on shirts and T-shirts. 'The Stone Roses have always been David's favourite band and he'd seen them at Glastonbury,' says Kearns, 'and then there's the roses connection, and the collection is released on the 30th anniversary of the debut album, which was also released on David's birthday, so there's a full circle.'

'I remember growing up and listening to the Stone Roses,' continues Kearns. 'Their style set the tempo for a lot of what came later. Those bands had such iconic looks that you bought into the entire package. You would listen to them and dress like them and when you saw someone walking down the street looking the same as you, you'd know they were into the same music. Whether it's a haircut or a pair of Doc Martens, you're telling the world you're into something.'

For Kearns, it's about taking that experience and marrying it with the sense of tradition of Kent & Curwen and reinterpreting it for a new generation. 'The greatcoat for AW18 was a good example,' he says. 'We made it in the original material by Fox Brothers, but recut it on David to make it a contemporary fit. I wanted it to feel non-generational. It's all about building a brand identity that doesn't feel too exclusive.'
